21st Century Teaching and Learning

Date: Tuesday December 10

Place: York University TEL 3072
(map and directions on reverse)

Time: 7:00 - 9:15 p.m

This session will provide an overview of The Learning Partnership programs that support educating students for life in an increasing diverse and technological environment. The Learning Partnership's Take Our Kids to Work, eLearning modules for educators, parents and employers will be highlighted and how these modules support the development of teaching and learning for the 21st century. Panel discussion will follow about the importance of involving all stakeholders in supporting the 21st century learner. Panel will consist of educators, parents and employers.

Panel member include:

Linda White has been Vice President, Global Performance and Learning since 2007 with overall responsibility for learning and performance management globally at Scotiabank. Linda has worked in the Scotiabank family since 1984, and prior to joining the Talent Management Team within HR, worked in various marketing, sales management, and training roles within Scotiabank's full-service brokerage and Wealth Management divisions.

Adrian Ransome, a father of two small children within the school system, is a strong advocate for creative and experiential learning opportunities for all children. As an entrepreneur who had very little guidance in school, he believes that early engagement touching on the skills required for the 21st century, such as creativity, collaboration and independent thinking, is absolutely fundamental to preparing children for the future.

Nancy Britton, Program Coordinator, Experiential Learning Department, Teaching and Learning, Toronto District School Board. Nancy has lead the Experiential Learning department at the TDSB for the past two years overseeing the subject areas of Business Studies, Cooperative Education and Technological Education. In this role she has lead her team in developing relevant and engaging programs to enrich the learning of students in these courses.

Kim Miller assumed the role of National Director of Programs at The Learning Partnership in September 2011. Kim is a former secondary school principal (Lawrence Park Collegiate, Sir Oliver Mowat Collegiate) and Senior Manager Secondary Teaching (Employee Services) at the Toronto District School Board. She spent many years in many diverse classrooms and school settings prior to her move into educational administration.
